The principal reasons assigned for the unfitness of the glebe-houses for residence, are, being too small, only cottages, with one or two rooms; old, and in a dilapidated state. The chief cause assigned for the unfitness of the Glebe-house, of Baxterley, in Warwickshire, is "the strange hardness of the water, it being subject to an hereditary complaint."

In consequence of these returns, it has been determined to build sundry new churches in the more populous places; and subscriptions in furtherance of such laudable objects have been promoted to an extent that is highly honourable to the general feeling on the subject.

It doubtless would be extremely entertaining to the minute and curious, to trace all the parties, sects, and various ramifications of the professors of Christianity; but such a detail cannot be here pursued and followed to its remotest boundaries. The succeeding mention merely of the names of many of the divisions will show how extensive would be even a full outline:—

I. According to their opinions respecting the person of Christ.
