

THE TRAVELLER'S HAND-BOOK,
&c., &c.

PART I.

1. EVERY Englishman who has lived long enough to be entitled to hold a modern jubilee, cannot fail to have observed the wonderful change, that, since his youth, has taken place in the sentiments of his countrymen towards foreigners and foreign countries. They now no longer dread communication; but are anxious, on the contrary, to be acquainted with one and to see the other.