

The Whirle-pool in the Danube, I. Ober-T.

The next day we passed by Ens, Anifia, upon the River Anifus, or Onafus, which taking its original in the Borders of Salzburgland runs into the Danube, and divides the higher from the lower Austria, having received into it self the River Saltza, upon which stands Cell, or Maria Cell, a place of the greatest Pilgrimage in Austria. Near this Town are many Roman Coyns and Antiquies found, and Lawiacum flood of old, a Roman Garrison, and afterwards a Bishop's See: we came to a Village on the North shoar of the Danube, called Greim, where the Graff von Leichtenfeyn hath a House. A little below this are two dangerous passages in the River; the one called the Strudel, where the River running amongst vast Rocks, some under water, and some above, the waves are broken with great force, and the Current is rapid, foaming, and troublesome; and some skill is required to pass between the Ledges of Rocks which are under water, and when the water is
